Course Description
How has diversity become an issue that has risen to the top of the agenda in so many contexts, and how has the historical emergence of this issue shaped the way we think about it, consciously and unconsciously? How have issues posed by racial, cultural, religious, and other forms of difference been understood and approached in the past? How does the issue of diversity in the United States compare to related issues and controversies in other societies? What can we learn from these comparisons?
This will be a collaboratively-taught course, developed by members of the History Department as one part of our effort to promote the goals of the University of Oregon’s diversity plan. We will be examining four case studies in order to think about the issue of diversity in historical and comparative terms. Please be sure to understand that we will not be giving a survey of the topic. Each of the faculty involved will teach a two-week module in his or her area of expertise. McCole will attend all sessions and coordinate the course in addition to teaching his own module.

Course Requirements
1. Four short papers, either 2-3 or 3-4 pages each, one for each of the four modules in the course. Papers will be assigned by the faculty member teaching each module.
2. A final examination on Tuesday, June 9 from 1:00-3:00 p.m. in Lillis 175.

Academic Honesty
All work that you submit for this course, including papers and exams, must be your own, and it must have been produced for this course. Please be sure that you are familiar with the University’s policies regarding academic honesty. When you submit work for the course, you are certifying that you have complied with these guidelines.
